Kissinger Staff Men Can Talk to Press

CPYRGHT

White House sources indicated yesterday that the wraps are finally being taken off members of Henry A. Kissinger's staff who now will be allowed to talk with newsmen.

Kissinger, reportedly at President Nixon's orders passed through H. R. Halderman, months ago told his men to avoid reporters though some were bold enough to get around the order. The ban led to numerous complaints in part because Kissinger himself has been so busy he has limited his own press contacts.

Meanwhile White House Press Secretary Ronald Ziegler confirmed yesterday that three members of the Kissinger staff are leaving. He said the reason was "to pursue their careers" and that there had been "no policy differences and no working relation differences."

Those now leaving are Morton Halperin, a former Pentagon official and expert in the nuclear and arms control field, who will join the Brookings Institution; Richard M. Moose, a holdover in the Kissinger shop from the time it was headed by Walt W. Rostow who has been acting as administrative officer, and Donald R. Lesh, a Foreign Service officer who came over from State to deal with European affairs and who now will be a Congressional fellow.

Lawrence Eagleburger left some time ago on doctor's orders and now holds a NATO post in Brussels. Daniel I. Davidson, who had served on the Paris peace talks delegation in the Johnson Administration, left to join a law firm. Richard L. Sneider, a Foreign Service officer, was transferred to Tokyo as a key negotiator for the American-Japanese talks on Okinawa.

Ziegler would not say yesterday when and how the new vacancies would be filled.
